Kemerī National Park as a nature-protected area of international importance was established in 1997. This territory was relatively little affected by the human activity.

Therefore KNP is a home to many protected plant and animal species that are rare both in Latvia and Europe. At present, the largest part of the park is covered by bogs and forests. Lielais Ķemeru tīrelis bog with its maze of bog lakes is very special. Thanks to bogs, mineral water rich in hydrogen sulphide forms underground, which was the basis for the former Kemerī spa.

Monitoring of the Baltic sea

The Baltic Sea is a semi-enclosed sea, which together with other physical as well as socio-economic characteristics makes it very sensitive to anthropogenic pressures. Eutrophication remains the most pressing problem in the region, as nitrogen and phosphorus inputs are still too high, despite considerable efforts to reduce discharges.
